Most teenagers will soon pay their own bills, open bank accounts, and maybe borrow money. However, few of them learn how money works before they finish school. In my opinion, every high school should teach students how to manage money.

First, money skills prevent serious mistakes. For example, a student who understands interest will think twice before borrowing money to buy something he cannot afford.

Second, these lessons build good habits early. For instance, students who practice making a monthly budget can start saving for their goals, such as a laptop or college.

Some people argue that parents, not schools, should teach children about money. Admittedly, parents play an important role, and many of them give useful advice at home. Nevertheless, not all parents feel confident about money, and some are too busy to explain it carefully. A school class can give every student the same basic knowledge, whatever their family situation is.

For these reasons, I believe that money management should be a regular subject in high school. With these skills, young people can make wiser choices for their future.
